DO NOT Type Beyond the Space Provided!

I was out with my brand new bright orange Nike sneakers. It was a sunny day in Brooklyn and I was headed to some sort of hipster market. There was a small fee to enter the space and a young woman at the door. As I paid my ticket, she looked down at my sneakers,

"They must be new," she remarked in a quite hostile voice (Hey, I had just paid a fee to enter this place I thought) And just as I was going to reply she took her foot out and placed it over my toes as if symbolically squashing a cigarette.

"They're so shining new it makes me want to spoil them." She retracted her foot and I looked down on my shoes, but there was no mark on them since she had stepped to lightly.

I was somehow frozen and could not answer. I guess I was in some form of shock. What was her problem? I just walked past her into the market, not looking back.

She had not spoiled my sneakers. They were still shining new. But her attitude had tainted them. I felt weird, insecure and weak in some way. She hadn't left a mark on the shoe, but somehow she had really stepped on me with that gesture. The shoes didn't feel new anymore, not at all.
